There is a high correlation between the rate of ceramide production and the rate of fatty acid oxidation in the liver of Huntington's disease patients. Thus, this suggests that the two processes might be connected in this disease. In fact, inhibitors of fatty acid oxidation, such as 2-decynoyl-acetate, were shown to slow down both the rate of ceramide synthesis and the accumulation of somatic huntingtin fragments, the former effect resulting in a delay in the clinical onset of the disease. It is hypothesized that treatment with ceramide or other lipids may trigger huntingtin fragmentation. This is further supported by studies showing that somatic mutant huntingtin fragments are sequestered by ceramide-rich sphingolipids. It is also hypothesized that decreased activity of the lysosomal enzyme acid sphingomyelinase, which cleaves sphingomyelin to ceramide, might be connected to decreased ceramide production in the liver of patients with Huntington's disease. Emergency department presentation of a rare case of an intrahepatic subcapsular hematoma following routine hepatic lobectomy.

Subcapsular liver hematomas are relatively rare and account for less than 5% of all hepatic hematomas. In general, trauma (notably motor vehicle collisions) is the leading cause of subcapsular liver hematomas in adults. A 47-year-old man presented to our emergency department after receiving general anesthesia for elective orthotopic liver transplantation. He had an uneventful hospital course. The following day, he went to the operating room for an explorative laparotomy that confirmed a small subcapsular hematoma in the left hepatic lobe. The patient was hemodynamically stable. Analgesia and antibiotic prophylaxis were initiated. Twenty-four hours later, the patient was discharged. During follow-up, the patient did not have any complaints. A CT scan 1 week later showed spontaneous resolution of the hematoma. Subcapsular hematomas are a rare but potentially life-threatening cause of acute abdominal pain. Most subcapsular liver hematomas occur as a result of trauma but can also occur spontaneously. A
