Making or buying a mitt for my "new boy" - cannot get him to wear them My new boy is a "free ranging" dog and doesn't tolerate being held. He loves to run around, eat, and play. He also enjoys laying out of the sun and is a very heavy dog. I currently have two mitts - one for him and one for a smaller dog. The larger dog wears them for a short period of time, then puts them on and lets them soak. His seems to work just fine, but he does not enjoy wearing them and is very uncomfortable. I do not want to buy a third one as we have two dogs. Any ideas on how to get my boy wearing a mitt? Comments Our first few days at adult dog about 2 months were spent walking together through snow and ice. The problem was the same - the poor girl couldn't wear any mitts and was really cold - I had to carry her the whole time. I bought some cheap "tissue" pads for her feet and that really helped. We always wore mittens when out with him and if it was cold he'd wear mine or Alex's but he's older now so we go out less and less and he just lays with his feet under the covers in winter.Q: C# - Updating a property of derived class through a base class I've got 3 classes as following : public class BaseEntity { public int Id { get; set; } } public class DerivedEntity : BaseEntity { public int Amount { get; set; } } public class Loan : DerivedEntity { public decimal Interest { get; set; } } Loan is an entity that have a property amount, and in DerivedEntity I want this property to be calculated and have a particular value. If I write a method that do the base calculation when constructing, the Amount property will be set to 0, because the Derived is not yet created. public void Construct() { Amount = GetAmount(); } This is not a good way, and I think that is possible to have the Amount property set a different value, depending on its parent. How can I achieve that? Thanks, A: It's possible

Unofficially, the total value of these development projects stands at $64 billion. It's a good bet that ultimately, government authorities will spend more than $20 billion on them, ensuring that the projects that are truly eligible for these grants will be fully funded. Because the sheer number of large-scale projects involved, the pressure is on to begin quickly. In some cases, the federal government may offer grants to help a state meet its goals for infrastructure projects. If so, money may be available to help the state meet its timeline or address a community's specific needs. What does it take to get a state to apply? The application process itself is relatively straightforward. States can request a direct grant, an indirect grant or a federal financial agreement. Direct grants are competitive and are awarded based on how well a state's plan meets the federal guidelines. States that do not meet these guidelines may be ineligible for a grant. Indirect grants come in two varieties: low-interest loan authority and lending bonds. Both are awarded based on the state's prior performance and the availability of qualified applicants. The most complex type of grant available are the federal financial agreement. These are benefits-based and are awarded based on the state's success and past performance. They use a formula that includes factors such as population growth, education attainment, workforce development, transportation and infrastructure needs and outcomes, such as health care. The key questions As in many areas of government, the federal government isn't entirely forgiving. States need to be specific with answers to four key questions. What would the project do? Most states are required to describe the need to be addressed by the project. Which federal programs do the project benefit? This is where the high-visibility grant or loan authority may be used. But this does not automatically result in a favorable response. The state's application should be a complete package, including a clear connection between how the project benefits the state and the role of the state in addressing the requirements outlined in the grant program. Where is the project located? Certain projects are obviously more attractive than others. If a project is located in a state that doesn't support it, states often face the prospect of competing against states that do. Are there other existing programs that provide similar benefits? Here's where states have the most flexibility to make a case
