Mild to moderate asthma is a chronic condition that has an impact on the patient's quality of life. Furthermore, this disease has been recognized as one of the most frequent reasons for medication use and ED visits. Treatment with a dry powder inhaler (DPI) is easy to use and effective in relieving symptoms. To help predict the clinical response to a particular dose of DPI in patients with mild to moderate asthma, it is important to understand and characterize the dose delivered in real life. The paper describes the development and characterization of the dose delivered by a DPI in mild to moderate asthmatic patients. The dose delivered by a DPI was characterized by its particle size, fine particle fraction (FPF), and drug deposition into the lower and middle airways. The device used in the study was the Diskhaler (Fisher & Paykel Healthcare, Auckland, New Zealand), a DPI that has a holding chamber equipped with a vibrating mesh. Two studies were performed: Study 1: Thirty-nine patients with mild to moderate asthma inhaled doses of 5, 20, 30, and 40 mg of budesonide/theophylline. Study 2: Thirty-seven patients with asthma and 15 healthy individuals inhaled doses of 1.5, 6, 9, and 12 mg of budesonide/theophylline. The device was operated according to the operating instruction and used postbronchodilator spirometry. The dose of budesonide/theophylline delivered by the DPI was characterized by its particle size, and FPF and the location of particles deposited in the patient's lungs. The FPF was inversely correlated with the dose and no differences were observed between the subjects with asthma and healthy individuals ( $p > 0.05$ ). The median particle size was inversely correlated with the dose. The median particle size was increased as the dose was increased. More budesonide/theophylline was deposited
